Keyword(s): HEALTH-CHILDREN RESEARCH

Annotation: This article discusses the epidemiologic triad of causation, which states that all illness results from a disequilibrium between host, agent and environmental factors. The "illness" investigated in this report--increased length of stay (LOS)--resulted from a combination of: patient factors such as the increased prevalence of chronic diseases in childhood, a revolution in neonatal survival and an increase in survivorship in general for severe diseases, such as congenital anomalies and genetic diseases; agent factors, such as the transition from agents of infectious disease to agents of chronic disease as well as iatrogenesis; and health care environmental factors, including equity issues involving the ethics of treatment, changes in medical technology and patterns of medical practice. The use of preadmission testing, increased participation by parents in the care of their children, an investigation of the appropriate venue for care of chronically ill children and the back transfer of recovering children to their home hospitals were recommended and considered by the hospital's administration and board of governors.

Annotation:	Three women -- Kim Philips, Terri Swearingen, and Hazel Johnson -- who became environmental activists at the grassroots level are profiled. The author asserts that most environmental justice protests arise out of poor, often minority communities, and women often become leaders at the grassroots level out of their concern for their children's health.
